Islam sects fuel Mideast chaos

An in-depth report on London's Muslim Brotherhood

The same London policymakers who were responsible for the programming of religious cults in the Middle East in the 19th century are now seizing upon the Ayatollah Khomeini destabilization in Iran to mass-program new fundamentalist cult operations throughout that strife-torn area.

Personified by such fundamentalist programmers as Princeton University's Bernard Lewis and his co-thinkers at Oxford and London Universities, this British school has moved to ideologically capture the Mideast policymaking apparatus in the U.S. government — through the agency of National Security Council head Zbigniew Brzezinski.

 Reacting with characteristic freneticism to the Khomeini events, Brzezinski has ordered Washington, D.C. thinktankers and Middle East hands to prepare a major study on Islamic fundamentalism.

This push behind fundamentalism has already had severe destabilizing effects on the Middle East, exactly as per Lewis's design to have the Middle East states "balkanized" into miniprincipalities of feuding tribal sects and clans.

Aside from the well-publicized Iran events themselves, the past days have seen the following:

—a reported growth of Khomeini-linked "Shi'ite armed cells" throughout the Arabian Gulf area, likely tied to the British intelligence group, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Oman and the Arabian Gulf.

—an outbreak of rumors of antiregime discontent in Saudi Arabia, emanating from London-allied circles in the National Guard and from minor Saudi princes in touch with both British intelligence and Israel's Mossad foreign intelligence service. This discontent is reportedly converging around and being funded by the head of the National Guard, Prince Abdullah.

—recent reports of Muslim Brotherhood attacks on Christian citizens in Iraq.

—an upsurge of Muslim Brotherhood-fomented tribal destabilizations against the new government of Afghanistan. This action is being aided and abetted by Anglophile networks within the Central Intelligence Agency.

Zionistfundamentalism

The fundamentalist activities of Khomeini and the Muslim Brotherhood are producing as their obvious consequence a Zionist-fundamentalist "backlash" around Israel, a factor which could push the Middle East toward general war in the short term.

While it is well known that the Mossad has played an increasing role in helping exacerbate the Muslim fundamentalist operations, Israeli Foreign Minister Dayan this week took the significant public step of warning Israel's Arab neighbors that if they aimed their "Islamic wave" against Israel, they would "pay the price." Coupled with a plethora of Israeli press editorials and politicians' statements deploring the "Islamic wave," Dayan's words can only have the effect of unsettling whatever international and regional moves are being made — by the French, Soviets, honest CIA networks, several Arab governments, and others — to neutralize the effects of Khomeini.

The potentials of Dayan's threats were dramatized in a chilling way in the Jan. 21 assassination, reputedly by Mossad and/or British agents, of Palestine Liberation Organization security chief Abu Hassan Salameh.

At this point, certain influential Middle East policy circles, representing long-time professionals in various government agencies, are not ready to endorse Brzezinski's project.

One highly-placed source stated this week, "This Islamic fundamentalist idea is nonsense, and whatever Brzezinski thinks, it's not going to be easy to get people to underwrite any attempts to legitimize it. As for the British, they're a joke.... The wave of the future in the Middle East lies elsewhere, in developing industries in the area and in understanding that groups like the Palestinians are the core intelligentsia of the area. If that is not understood, nothing can work in the Middle East."

What is the Muslim Brotherhood?

Triggered by the Islamic fundamentalist destabilization in Iran, the Muslim Brotherhood is now on a rampage in various nations of the Islamic world, an expression of the Royal Institute of International Affairs' commitment to rely on mass-oriented-cults to keep the Middle East and other developing sectors out of the development configuration centered around the European Monetary Fund.

A fanatical and puritanical secret society, the Brotherhood — or "Ikhwan" — is organized into special cells and so-called "temples," from which it spawns local and regional branches of its cult operations. Strongest in Egypt, where it dominates the religious establishment, the Brotherhood is also extremely powerful in Pakistan, where its Jamaat e-Islam branch literally runs the government. It is also well organized in Nigeria and Senegal, and is
