creased, and Europe is actually conscious of (and it is a justified consciousness) a strongly increased, generally mutual security. This development of both of the last decades, the 1960s and 1970s, has shown that there is no security if the other person too doesn't feel himself secure, or, to paraphrase a well-known phrase: Security is always the security of the other person too.

If I am allowed to add a word or two here ... then I would like to say with equal emphasis that this is no one-time thing that people do once and then can keep, but a constant, increasing task, because, sometimes, even economic and social influences effect changes and instabilities that can bring about new dangers. Even the military balance of power is not a one-time task, but a constant one. It is not necessary that there be a total arithmetic or mathematical identity among all the different kinds of armed forces or weapons—the military balance of power must be generally maintained.

... I will say it again: a policy of balance is by no means strictly limited to the military sector, if it is to bring success in securing the peace along with it.

This fear on both sides, which played such a great role here yesterday on the German side—while the other side wants to use arms limitation in order to get political advantage for itself—this fear on both sides can only be overcome by long term processes and developments in building confidence, and these processes must be continued.

Naturally, even in an era of detente, acute conflicts, unforeseen conflicts can occur— and what is necessary here is a command of crises, and the capability to end the crisis. One of the preconditions for this is that the parties potentially in conflict remain in contact with each other. It is important that the statesmen in the world speak with each other before a crisis occurs, so that they know what they can expect of each other, in case it does occur. I would also like to say that we, here, have contributed significantly towards the ability and the will, we have contributed a great deal so that leading persons in positions of responsibility get to know each other.

Here I want to refer—without appearing arrogant—to the continuous contacts that the Chancellor of this state has entered into with all the leading statesmen from both sides, and which have been supported even by Eastern Europe—not only in the West—and I must tell you that I hope very much that it will finally come to a meeting, to personal acquaintance between Mr. Carter and Mr. Brezhnev. I consider it to be a mistake that both of these two persons do not know each other. (applause)

Overcoming crises requires the political will to shun provocations from the other side; it requires the will and the capacity to make one's own options, one's own negotiating possibilities unmistakably clear to the other, and it requires the will to take the cutting edge out of dangerous situations by one's own readiness to compromise. It demands the will to make it possible so that the participants can save face.

The greater the calculability of the political—and also the military—conduct of a participant, all the more less is the danger of an acute crisis. And a precondition for calculability is the transparency of one's politics, the plausibility of what one is striving for. For example, we are striving for more transparency in the instruments of military power, and even in the instruments of economic power that go into armaments, because only this will make possible progress in the formation of mutual confidence. This goes for SALT, this goes for MBFR.

Transparency, and the predictability of one's own policies ... I would be thankful if we could recognize the policies of all the other partners in Europe as being characterized by the desire for transparency, by the transparency of those governments...

(After several attacks on West German government policy by opposition politicians Helmut Kohl, Alfred Dregger, and Manfred Woerner):

Defectors scandal, Luns's

Attacks on NATO policies from leading West Germans are not the only problems that the Alliance and its West German friends are confronted with. Within the last two weeks, four secretaries in NATO head-quarters in Brussels, and in the Bonn headquarters of the West German Christian Democracy, defected to East Germany. Although this is a severe problem by itself, the damage has been compounded by documentation from one former secretary, Ursel Lorenzen, that NATO is using its on-going WINTEX and CIMEX command staff exercises to prepare the authoritarian civilian and military control needed to carry out a first nuclear strike against the Warsaw Pact.

Unfortunately for NATO, Ursel Lorenzen knows what she has been talking about on her East German radio broadcasts. For 10 years she was the secretary for British NATO diplomat Terence Morgan, Director of NATO Council Operations, who was in charge of organizing NATO's semi-annual command staff exercises.

Her broadcasts have also covered such topics as NATO's stake in political destabilizations of the Warsaw Pact, NATO's intention to use China as a NATO surrogate against the Soviet Union, and

I worked on putting this alliance together, its deterrence and its (defense) policy. That was 20 years ago, and I do not think you remember how it was then, when that attempt at detente failed, when the Paris summit meeting between East and West failed .... I understand that some of you do not know, but some of you do, Messrs. Mertes, Marx, and maybe Woerner, just how badly a German government in the 1960s burned its fingers, not only with the East but also with the West, on the issue of the Multinational Nuclear Force in NATO ... The American government let that drop faster than the Germans knew what was happening. I would enjoy seeing you get your hands burned in that way. (Dregger then shouts that Schmidt should make unpopular decisions against the left wing in his own Social Democratic Party.)

You know, I do just that, and not only in military strategic questions, but in many areas I weigh the facts and both sides of the argument and I decide according to my oath of office and my conscience. But I would like to let you know a secret of my political experience. When one decides according to his conscience, even against the prevalent stream of popularity, then in fact it turns out that you win popularity.

Helmut Kohl: Schmidt, you don't get your policy through because you are a coward, you are too much of a coward to confront Herbert Wehner.

Schmidt: Mr. Kohl, you are very sensitive when it comes to political criticism. I am not. I have a very thick skin. But, I also have the power to hit back. You had better think over whether you have the right or the legitimacy to accuse me of being a coward in this parliament. And your information on my alleged position on the neutron bomb is wrong. Unless, of course, you have confidential documents from meetings you did not attend, and those documents are forged.

Hans Apel: Security is of course, one precondition for the well-being of a country. But war is not the father of all things, peace is, and that means the social and economic well-being of a country is a decisive contribution to its defense efforts. Defense expenditures, yes, but

past bedevil NATO's friends

NATO General Secretary Joseph Luns's strategy for dealing with the revelation of his Dutch Nazi past (see below.)

The three East Germans who worked for the Christian Democracy in Bonn, Christel Broszey, Inge Goliath, and Ursula Höfs, have been silent about their activities, but this has not calmed down the CDU. Both Broszey and Goliath fled to East Germany, while Höfs was arrested by West German authorities. As in the Lorenzen case, key CDU offices were targeted, with Broszey being the secretary to CDU General Secretary Kurt Biedenkopf, while Goliath worked under Werner Marx, CDU spokesman on East European affairs.

It is well known in CDU circles that both Broszey and Goliath typed confidential internal party memoranda, and both knew of the CDU's support for the China card, in addition to the inner party faction fight between Biedenkopf and CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl.

The fact that both Biedenkopf and Marx are vociferous anti-communists who constantly attack the ruling West German Social Democratic Party for being "soft on Communist infiltrators" has increased the shock in CDU headquarters.

The Lorenzen spy case could not have occurred at a worse time for NATO. Several weeks before Lorenzen defected, NATO General Secretary Luns was already under attack for his membership in the Dutch Nazi NSB party from 1933 to 1936, after the Dutch War History Institute confirmed that his name had been on the NSB membership lists for the years stated.

Luns's explanation for this damaging fact was that his brother, an admitted Dutch Nazi, had signed him up in the NSB, and kept his name on the rolls for three years, after which Luns's name was taken off the lists, all without Luns's knowledge.

Lorenzen shot down this already shaky excuse by stating it was well known in NATO headquarters that the only person who signed Luns up for Nazi membership was Luns himself. The fact that E. N. van Kleffens, a former Dutch Foreign Minister under whom Luns served, stated that if Luns's Nazi past had been known in 1937, he would never have been allowed to serve in the Foreign Ministry, has only reinforced Lorenzen's charges.
