

director Jean-Paul Gagnon is also Vice-President of Valleyfield Chemical, an explosives plant which was wholly owned by Space Research. Gagnon's nephew, M. Chalifou, was general manager of Space Research.

The most important Bronfman asset on Bombardier's board, however, is Pierre Cote, Chairman of Celanese of Canada, and with Charles Bronfman director of the Bank of Montreal and the Cadillac Fairview real estate conduit for dirty money. Cote sits on the board of Domtar Inc. along with Arthur Ross, station chief for New York of Britain's MI-6 intelligence division. Cote is also a member of the Consulting Committee of Royal Trust Corporation, the corporation that bought mobster Meyer Lansky's International Bank of Miami, and sits on the boards of the Canadian Development Corporation and Texasgulf.

Other Bombardier directors include William Ian MacKensie Turner, Jr., President of Consolidated Bathurst, director, Power Corporation, Celanese of Canada, and director, J. Henry Schroeder Banking Corporation, part of the financial network which financed Hitler before World War II; and Sol Simon Reisman, a graduate of the London School of Economics who has spent 10 years as the Canadian representative in international trade negotiations, including GATT, and is known as a trade-warfare expert.

One of the most significant aspects of the military side of Bombardier is its Logistic Equipment Division, specializing in vehicle prototypes for all-terrain rapid troop transport.

According to Bombardier's 1981 annual report, the company expects to considerably expand its aeronautic and logistical capabilities for 1982. It states that it has the ability to "adapt its commercial products for military purposes." Bombardier has contracts with the U.S. as well as the Canadian military.

At the time Space Research was exposed, the remainder of the site and equipment was bought by Sheikh Saad Gabr, a funder and controller of the terrorist Muslim Brotherhood internationally. Gabr reorganized his section of Space Research into what is known as Space Technologies, Inc. (while retaining 75 percent of Space Research's former employees). The new company purports to be involved in satellite launching.

In 1979, Gabr founded an Islamic Cultural Center in North Hatley, Quebec, a town—mostly owned by Gabr—located on a lake that straddles the U.S.-Canada border. The center is linked to the terrorist-spawning East-West University of Chicago, the center of activity for the American Ramallah Federation, an umbrella for radical Pakistani groups in the United States which has funded Rev. Jesse Jackson and PUSH. According to Arab diplomatic sources, Gabr's firm is involved in shipping arms to Iran's Ayatollah Khomeini.
