belief in the Filioque clause of the Nicene Creed, namely, that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and from the Sonimplying the divine potential of Man.

"As far as the Pope was concerned, the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCIC)—meeting on and off since 1970—was 'a dead duck,' "the paper reports, noting that the Pope wrote the letter "after strong representations from his conservative English Roman Catholic bishops. . . . Two of the strongest Roman Catholic objectors are said to be the Archbishop of Birmingham, the Most Rev. Maurice Couve de Murville and the Bishop of Portsmouth, the Rt. Rev. Christian Hollis."

Meanwhile, Runcie received "further depressive Easter news," with reports of several more Anglican bishops joining in the campaign against ordination of women as priests.

U.S. blackmailed Salvadoran military

The United States' control over Salvadoran military supply lines permitted the State Department to blackmail the Salvadorans into adopting the no-win strategy that now threatens to hand the country over to Sovietrun narco-terrorists, the Washington Post documented March 27.

The United States "has a high degree of control over the day-to-day conduct of the war," including supplying all the fuel for military helicopters—but never providing more than a 30-day supply at any one time, the Post reported. Because the United States has used its control to impose a strategy of fighting a "low-intensity conflict"—instead of total war-top combat officers in El Salvador "anxious to fight a faster, more aggressive war" ordered a study done during the past 18 months, on the capacity of the military to operate if the United States reduces, or eliminates its aid. The study concluded that the military could only go allout for about six weeks, before their supplies would run out.

One month ago, the United States used this blackmail capability, to force El Salvador's military to accept negotiations with the narco-terrorist Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front.

AIDS victims urged to commit suicide

People with AIDS should be offered counselling on euthanasia and how to commit suicide, Brenda Almond, reader in philosophy and education at Hull University, Britain, was quoted in the Sunday Telegraph March 26. Almond told the newspaper:

"Unlike the victims of many other fatal illnesses, people with AIDS are often young, usually in full command of their faculties, and are fully aware of the details of their illness. It is quite possible that they will feel the need for some means of escape.'

She said that doctors should be permitted, as they are in Holland, to actively assist patients to "end their suffering." "There is a good case for saying that because suicide is legal, people should have the right to know how best to do it."

Almond's views were immediately backed by the Voluntary Euthanasia Society in Britain. But Dr. Charles Farthing, senior registrar at the AIDS unit of St. Stephen's Hospital, Westminster, the country's largest AIDS treatment center, said that most doctors now treating AIDS patients would reject suggestions that they should advise sufferers on suicide. "I do not believe that patients should be in any way encouraged to take their own lives."

Meanwhile, in France, at a meeting of the Federation of Insurance Companies in Paris, it was resolved that anyone who tests HIV positive will be excluded from life insurance or will pay much higher premiums.

In addition, the French state social and health insurance companies are planning to increase monthly premiums because of the growing number of AIDS victims. One idea being discussed is to increase the monthly payments about 25% for all people in the age group 20-35. The cost for one AIDS patient was recently calculated at about 150,000 francs, of which 86% is being paid for by the state. An estimated 3 billion francs per year is currently being spent.

Briefly

- IRAN reportedly seized and held a yacht for several hours on March 23 with five members of the Kuwaiti royal family on board. Kuwait later denied that the incident had happened, but this could stem from its embarrassment that, together with the five "princes," were five British girls from an "escort service."
- JAPAN on March 28 refused the changes which the Bush administration has proposed to make in an already-concluded agreement on joint development of a new FSX fighter aircraft. The changes involved guarantees against supposedly "sensitive American technology" with commercial applications falling into Japanese hands. Members of Japan's ruling party a day later called on their government to scrap the pact and develop the FSX independently.
- GREENWAVES is the name of a new British environmentalist organization whose kinship to Hitler's Nazis is open and public. A key figure is Michael Walker, whose magazine, Scorpion, has been reviving the ideas of Walter Darre, minister of youth and sport in Nazi Germany and Hitler's principal "environmentalist" adviser.
- TURKISH Prime Minister Turgut Özal replaced 15 of his 22 ministers, March 30, responding to the crisis in his party, which suffered heavy losses in municipal elections. State Minister Yusuf Özal, the Prime Minister's brother, was among those
- NORTH KOREA'S ambassador in Beijing, Chu Chang-jun, said that recent talks with U.S. officials in the Chinese capital "are good and we hope to continue them," at what Reuters called a rare news conference in Beijing March 29. the P.R.C. helped arrange the three rounds of talks which North Korean and U.S. diplomats have held since December 1988.
