

Ebola: Bertrand Russell's Dream Come True?

“If a Black Death could spread throughout the world once in every generation, survivors could procreate freely without making the world too full,” wrote the quintessential British imperial genocidalist Lord Bertrand Russell in his 1953 book, The Impact of Science on Society. As mankind faces the Ebola epidemic now spreading from West Africa, we are on the verge of Russell’s dream come true.

Russell’s dream is mankind’s nightmare, and its potential realization is no accident. From the 1970s onward, we in the LaRouche movement have warned that the genocidal economic policy imposed on Africa, in particular, threatened to create a new set of pandemics that would not be limited to that continent, but spread throughout the world. LaRouche’s assessment was known, and even shared, by many in positions to change economic policy—but the genocidal policies continued. They cohered with the British Empire’s policy of depopulation, you see.

Now, with the Ebola cases turning up in a totally unprepared United States and Western Europe, the reality of the danger is staring us in the face. There is no place on Earth which is protected from the spread of this deadly disease, or one like it. Health-care capabilities have been taken down, public-health measures slashed, research budgets decimated, and living standards reduced. Add to that, the policy of continuous warfare, and the world’s population is well on its way to suffering a New Black Death, on the scale of the 14th Century—and probably, due to globalization, much worse.

Those, like President Obama, who claim we are doing the best we can, are lying. The U.S. government, like those of the developed countries in Western Europe, has been criminally negligent in dealing with the threat, which was essentially ignored when it first arose nearly a year ago. That was when the threat appeared to be confined to those “dark-skinned people” in Africa. Now it is clearly a threat to all mankind—and had better be treated as such.

No less an authority than the head of the U.S. Southern Command, Gen. John Kelly, speaking on Oct. 8, spoke of his fear that if Ebola were to spread to the Caribbean, it would “rage” as in Africa. As the Texas cases show—and there’s probably much more we don’t know—the disease is here.

In October 2001, Lyndon LaRouche first enunciated a Biological Defense Initiative strategy, in response to what was the threat of anthrax, but the point remains the same. Emergency measures must be taken to secure the environment, provide sufficient facilities and personnel, and the like, but the response cannot be confined to treatment measures alone. There must be a crash buildup of health-care and economic infrastructure for the entire population—in addition to crash research efforts.

The genocidal intent of Obama, the British, and the current global financial institutions thus comes clearly into focus. They are shutting down hospitals, as policy! Do you doubt they’re out to kill? There are only four hospitals in the United States equipped to adequately isolate patients with diseases such as Ebola! Is anyone talking about increasing them?

Time is running very, very short. Already, the African situation is out of control, and any assurance that the U.S. is safe has been shattered. We are not yet in a New Black Death—but it is staring us in the face.

Let’s finally bury the ghoulish Bertrand Russell for good!
