

British Global War Drive Runs Into Roadblocks

The British Empire's frantic global war drive, spurred by the death-throes of its bankrupt world financial system, has hit some significant roadblocks in recent days. Nationalist resistance, combined with the back-up from the powerful Eurasian bloc of Russia, China, and India, and from the patriotic section of the U.S. military, has set back, for the moment, its imperial schemes to both violate national sovereignty, and accelerate the process of permanent war now destroying Southwest Asia.

We present three case studies below, which demonstrate the pitched battle underway. In every one of these cases, as in other regions, the war crises are products of British instigation, not local conditions, and permanent solutions cannot be found without defeating the British imperialists at their global end-game.

No one should expect the British imperialists to take no for an answer. As reflected in the non-stop propaganda assault underway against India and China for "causing" the world food crisis by having too many people, and against Russia for exercising its status as a world power, the globalist ideologues are on a confrontation course with the powers of Eurasia. They are playing the British-created Tibet card against China, and have activated their assets in Pakistan to collapse the new government coalition, which had been pursuing an alternative to the military crackdown strategy which was preprogrammed to blow up the region. Part and parcel of this confrontation strategy is the ongoing attempt to ram through the adoption of the Lisbon Treaty in Europe, which would negate national sovereignty, and establish a British imperial fascist dictatorship.

Prince Philip's commitment to eliminating what he has recently again denoted as "too many people" is the driving force behind the British Imperial war drive.

Despite popular opposition to Lisbon, and some street organizing attempting to mobilize pressure to stop it, the best chance for blocking the Lisbon steamroller (at least 13 nations' parliaments have already ratified it) is the June 12 referendum in Ireland, the only country giving its citizens the opportunity to vote on it. If one nation rejects the Treaty, it goes into the dustbin, where it belongs.

The only way to definitively stop the British war-drive, however, is to defeat their subversion of the United States, and ensure the victory of a Presidency based once again on the principle of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. The achievement of such a Presidency would be the death knell for the Lisbon Treaty, as well as for the permanent war process now being stymied, but not stopped.
