The Pakistani people can compel China into taking urgent action behind the scenes to de-escalate this crisis by publicly calling upon it to do so, which would also create the optics of their country's US-backed fascist post-modern coup regime literally shooting at Chinese-friendly peaceful protesters, thus forcing China to get diplomatically involved if it isn't already.

The fascist authorities who were installed in Pakistan following last April's US-orchestrated but superficially "democratic" post-modern coup against former Prime Minister Imran Khan risk replicating the East Pakistan tragedy if they don't immediately stop shooting at their own people. The ousted leader's supporters are rallying around his residence to prevent the local police from serving him an arrest warrant on a trumped-up graft charge that was concocted against him as "lawfare".

Instead of reconsidering the wisdom of clashing with unarmed and purely peaceful civilians, the fascist authorities ordered their goons to assault them all with tear gas, rubber bullets, and reportedly even live ammunition that was shot into the air according to some accounts. This de facto declaration of war by the fascist post-modern coup regime on its own people could dangerously place the country's political-security trajectory on the irreversible path towards civil war.

Former Prime Minister Khan warned as much in a tweet on Wednesday that he shared alongside a photo of himself sitting down in front of a pile of tear gas canisters that were shot at his home the other day. He wrote that

"My house has been under heavy attack since yesterday afternoon. Latest attack by Rangers, pitting the largest pol party against the army. This is what PDM and the enemies of Pakistan want. No lessons learnt from the East Pakistan tragedy."

The military-intelligence establishment must urgently rescind their de facto declaration of war on the Pakistani people, do whatever's required behind the scenes to have the fascist post-modern coup's leading figures resign as the first step towards national reconciliation, and then hold early elections. It's only through this three-step process that the worst-case scenario of replicating the East Pakistan tragedy can potentially be avoided since anything less than that makes this more likely by the hour.

One of the most populous countries in the world is being pushed towards civil conflict by those conspirators who illegally usurped power with the US' help last April and subsequently crashed the economy. This factual framing of Pakistan's latest political-security dynamics proves that the increasingly violent clashes provoked by the fascist post-modern coup regime against its own people could lead to a global crisis in the event that they soon spiral even further out of control.

If the military-intelligence establishment continues waging war on the Pakistani people, then their victims should consider publicly calling on their iron brothers in China to urgently rein them in as a last resort to avert the worst-case scenario that former Prime Minister Khan just warned about. China's diplomatic miracle in brokering the Iranian-Saudi rapprochement last week proves that it has the political capabilities to peacefully resolve the Pakistani Crisis if the people request for it to do so.

After all, the People's Republic also stands to geostrategically lose if that neighboring nation descends into civil war. The China-Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC), which is the flagship project of Beijing's Belt & Road Initiative (BRI) that's aimed at creating a Community of Common Destiny for Mankind, would practically become inoperable should that happen. Not only could that block off China's shortcut to the Indian Ocean, but it would deal an immense blow to its soft power and BRI's reputation as well.

Without intending to come off as "conspiratorial", observers can't preclude the possibility that the fascist post-modern coup regime's US backers encouraged them to provoke a civil war partially for the purpose of advancing America's anti-Chinese "containment" strategy via unconventional means. At the very least, its military-intelligence establishment wouldn't so publicly violate its people's human rights and possibly even countenance war crimes against them without the US' advance approval.

This means that the latest escalation of the nearly year-long Pakistani Crisis is connected to the US just like its origin is, thus extending credence to the preceding concerns that the events which Washington set into motion last April are actually part of its larger Hybrid War on China. This South Asian state was knocked out of the geostrategic game at the most sensitive moment in the global systemic transition shortly after this process accelerated following the start of Russia's special operation.

That outcome hasn't just proven disastrous for the Pakistani people who've suffered as a result of the crippling economic crisis that followed, but it also unexpectedly offset a key pillar of China's grand strategy related to its reliance on CPEC as a non-US-controlled shortcut to the Indian Ocean. Furthermore, both the political and especially economic dimensions of the US-provoked Pakistani Crisis also raised serious doubts about CPEC's future as well as that of BRI more broadly.

Nobody can therefore deny that the US' regime change in Pakistan last year had very serious consequences for China that are becoming worse by the hour as that country's fascist post-modern regime risks pushing it into civil war after de facto declaring war on its own people. China might already be working behind the scenes to try and de-escalate the latest and thus far most dangerous phase of this nearly year-long crisis on its borders, but it would still help a lot if Pakistanis publicly requested this.

That's because this could compel China into taking urgent action behind close doors if it hasn't already done so, not to mention creating the optics of Pakistan's US-backed fascist post-modern coup regime literally shooting at Chinese-friendly peaceful protesters, which would force China to get involved. No other party apart from the US has the influence to peacefully resolve this crisis, and seeing as how Washington's interests are perversely advanced by exacerbating it, the onus thus falls on Beijing.

Practically speaking, China has a credible chance of brokering peace and thus averting another Pakistani Civil War, but this best-case scenario can only happen if the fascist post-modern coup regime has the political will to save their country from this US-engineered collapse. If they do, then China can simply propose the previously suggested three-step peace plan related to immediately ceasing fire against unarmed peaceful protesters, creating a caretake government, and holding early elections.

The fascist post-modern coup regime might agree to this in exchange for a Chinese bailout that could replace the IMF's continually delayed one that's full of strings and has thus far been withheld by that body's US leader for the purpose of keeping its proxies in check in case they consider "defecting". That last-mentioned observation is precisely what China would be tempting them to do, basically "defect" from the US in exchange for much-needed aid and thus averting the seemingly impending civil war.

The latest and thus far most dangerous phase of the nearly year-long Pakistani Crisis is rife with unpredictability since everything is moving so rapidly right now so it's difficult to predict what might come next. In any case, it would greatly help the cause of peace and preventing a replication of the East Pakistani tragedy that former Prime Minister Khan just warned about if his unarmed peaceful protesters publicly called on China to diplomatically intervene and prevent this from becoming a global crisis.
